What do you appreciate most about Nagarro?

The “Work from Anywhere” policy gives us a great work-life balance. I also feel the culture at Nagarro inculcates a sense of belonging and purpose as my contributions are valued. I tend to have a formal approach to work and sometimes find it difficult to break out of my shell as a thinker, but I've now become comfortable enough to be myself during connects and online socials.

What is that one quality that has helped you along your career path?

Excellence. I pride myself in producing the best quality work to the best of my ability so that I am satisfied. I achieve this by having a great work ethic and collaborating with colleagues to strengthen the quality of my work further, and finally, being aware of my limitations. I struggle with my listening skills sometimes and get ahead of my colleagues in discussions, but I am working on that.

If you could break one stereotype, what would it be?

“Women with children are less devoted to their work!” Planned or unplanned, mothers are driven by a sense of responsibility, a desire to provide a better life for their children (especially single moms), and a sense of responsibility and awareness of being a good role model to their children. I believe this stereotype to be a myth and direct bias, putting unnecessary limits on women who are capable!

Who is your personal role model?

Dr. Felling Yende, my former VP: of Transformation South Africa, is currently CEO. She is a hard worker and carries all adversities that come with her role at work, at home, and in the community with finesse and grace! She still finds time to give of herself to her mentees and community. She identified my potential at a tender age, imparted knowledge, and refined my skills with much love and wisdom.
